

The FCC should not implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's telephone privacy law protections. Indiana's law has lessened the number of unwanted interruptions received in my home from telemarketers.

In the past, telemarketing calls would begin at 8:00 am and continue past 9:00 p.m. These calls would even occur on weekends. The calls have disrupted our family dinner as well as homework study time for my 2 grade school children. There were times when I had counted up to 23 calls in one day. They are a nuisance and impinge on my rights as well as those of my families for uninterrupted quality time. Is it not enough that I receive an assortment of unwanted "junk" mail? The "telemarketing" calls are much worse.

The Indiana law has greatly increased the privacy from these calls in our home. The FCC should explore imposing stricter laws!
